

DID YOU KNOW? IRAs be used to benefit a charity, like the Dahlem Center.

IRAs can be a great source of funds to provide a benefit for a favorite charity, but using these funds can create a number of traps that must be avoided in order to maximize benefits to both the charity and other IRA beneficiaries. The steps below will help you ensure that you're setting up your beneficiaries correctly so your assets live on as you wish.

01

Name the Charity directly on your beneficiary form

The money will go directly to the charity, avoiding both the time and expense of probate. Additionally, the distribution to the charity will not be considered income to the estate of the deceased IRA owner.

02

Set up separate accounts

Consider transferring the portion you intend to leave to charity into a separate IRA account. If other beneficiaries inherit the same IRA as a charity and the charity's portion is not "cashed out" or split within the IRS prescribed time frames, the stretch IRA for the living beneficiaries will be lost.

Reverse your bequests

If you have made provisions for certain charities under your will and also have retirement plans, an effective tax strategy would be to reverse the bequests with non-retirement assets. This way, the charity receives the same amount that you were going to leave them in your will, but your heirs will end up with more, because the money they will inherit will not be subject to income tax, as the retirement plan would be.

04

Don't convert assets you plan to leave to a charity

Many charitable organizations and religious groups are structured tax-exempt organizations, like the Dahlem Center. When an IRA is left to one of these charities, the charity does not have to pay income tax on the distribution as other beneficiaries would. As a result, if you intend to leave your IRA to charity, converting it to a Roth IRA is generally not a wise move. Why pay income tax on the conversion when the money will be going to the charity tax free anyway?

05

Beware of naming a charity as a trust beneficiary

A charity is known as a "nondesignated beneficiary," because it does not have a life expectancy. In general, trusts are also non-designated beneficiaries. Certain trusts, known as see-through (or lookthrough) trusts allow for post-death distributions to be stretched based on the trust beneficiary with the shortest remaining life expectancy. Since a charity has no life expectancy, if it is named as a beneficiary of a trust that is also inheriting an IRA, it can eliminate the stretch for the remaining trust beneficiaries.
